COURSE OVERVIEW

The frauds associated with account holders' identity subversion is a problem for banks regardless of their size or location. Massive increase in the daily volume of cheques has enhanced probability of frauds warranting due diligence, mental alertness and skillfulness on the part of the officers responsible to handle such transactions. Most of the banks have either refined their back office signature verification process, including computer-based application software that provides the ability to safeguard customers through signature verification practices and reasonable standards or they are cognizant of the need to upgrade their systems. The handwritten signature verification practices to establish whether a signature is a forgery or not, are being increasingly supplanted by automatic identification and verification systems. However, till such time the banks' systems become fully electronified and operative, (including online dynamic signature verification or any other advanced electronic systems) the banks' managers shall have to continue to rely on the manual systems with intense vigilance and professional diligence.
